Nutrition Ratio Of Men And Women Of Developing Countries Contributes To the Gender Gap Share on social media WASHINGTON (AP) — There are more men than women in developing countries. Now, that can be bad for men, but it can be even worse for women in an era when they're closing the gender gap in many areas of education, public health, political power and economic participation. According to a new Oxfam report, lower rates of nutrition among girls due to more gender-based violence, early marriage and lack of access to education than boys are compounding the gap. In addition, wealthier countries have the best child nutrition, followed by middle-income countries and poorer ones. And for half of the world's developing countries, the percentage of their populations living in poverty — and therefore the percentage of young children and pregnant women getting enough to eat and nutrients needed for healthy child development — is higher than it is for rich countries. That has consequences for women, who make up more than half the world's population and contribute more than half of human capital. "Women are half the world's population and we know how to care for our families," said Oxfam America CEO Margaret Lewan. "When a mother is healthy and educated, her children do better, too." Girls are 13 times more likely than boys to die from measles, and three to five times more likely to die from diarrhea and pneumonia, according to the report by the international aid group.
